KIGALI, April 9 (Reuter) - French troops evacuated foreigners on Saturday from Rwanda's capital where relief officials said tribal slaughter and renewed civil war had killed tens of thousands of people.

Witnesses said three convoys of foreigners which left Kigali by road had reached the relative calm of Rwanda's central African neighbour, Burundi, late on Saturday.

Rebels of the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF) said a 4,000-strong force was advancing on the capital on two fronts

"They (troops) may arrive as early as before dawn on Sunday. But they met strong resistance along the way, so this is not certain," said an RPF official who asked not to be named.

The RPF official said rebel forces would reinforce a 600-strong battalion already in Kigali and would engage government troops who have gone on a rampage in the city.

"We must destroy the capacity of this regime to kill and destroy," the official said. "They (government soldiers) have three options : join us, stand aside, or fight us."

The official said the main RPF force would remain in the northern region that it holds, mainly to mop up government forces resisting them in that area.

In Washington, President Bill Clinton said he was "deeply concerned" with the fate of Americans - most of them teachers and missionaries - caught in the escalating violence.

"I am deeply concerned about the continuing violence" in the central African nation, Clinton said in his weekly radio address to the nation, which was broadcast live from the Oval Office.

Fighting erupted in the former Belgian colony following Wednesday's rocket attack in Kigali that killed President Juvenal Habyarimana and his counterpart from Burundi.

State Department spokesman Michael McCurry said "the situation in Rwanda remained tense.

A Burundian journalist told Reuters by telephone in Nairobi dozens of U.S. marines had arrived in the central African state to oversee evacuation of American civilians from Rwanda.

"Americans and Europeans have arrived here by road from the chaos of Rwanda," journalist Deogratius Muvira said.

"They were 172 people, travelling in 72 cars from Butare in southern Rwanda," he said. Separately, 118 U.S. marines arrived in Burundi, the first of a 330-strong force.

In Paris, the foreign ministry said French troops evacuated 43 nationals from Kigali by air and other rescue flights were planned.

"A plane took off from Kigali a little more than an hour ago," a ministry spokeswoman said. "The operation is proceeding very well."

The Red Cross reported tens of thousands had been killed in a two-day orgy of violence which pitted gangs of Hutu tribesmen, backed by renegade army units, against Tutsi rivals accused of killing President Habyarimana, a Hutu, last Wednesday.

"Yesterday, we were talking about thousands of dead. Today we can start with tens of thousands," Herve Le Guillouzic, medical coordinator of the International Committee of the Red Cross, told Reuters.

He said corpses were everywhere – "in the houses, in the streets, everywhere".

Reuters Television cameraman Mohamed Shaffi said he filmed one American and one Red Cross convoy snaking their way through the hilly city towards the main road to the Burundi capital.

"It is extremely tense. Roadblocks are manned by large groups of youths wielding knives and handgrenades and warning they will attack and kill French and Belgians," Shaffi said.

Some 400 French troops flew into the city early on Saturday in three military transports, but apparently failed to secure the airport before venturing into the eerily-quiet city where a lull in fighting was reported.

Belgian paratroopers, carrying tonnes of military equipment, were supposed to land later but officials in Brussels said they might be diverted to Burundi or Kenya. French radio reported their planes had been unable to land after Rwandan troops opposed to their arrival blocked the runway.

Colonel Luc Marchal, commander of Belgian forces serving with a 2,500-strong U.N. mission in the country, said government forces had blocked the airport runway with fire trucks after the French troops landed.

He said rebels and government forces were still fighting while aid workers said heavy weapons were being used.

Paul Kagame, leader of the predominantly Tutsi rebel RPF, rejected a new interim government and said his troops would attack and take the city.

But new interim President Venat Theodore Sindikubwabo said that only those who did not understand the constitution would dispute or oppose his ascension to power.

A spokesman for the Belgian branch of Medecins sans Frontieres (MSF), an international medical charity, said the rebels had launched an attack on the northern town of Ruhengeri.

Gangs of Hutu youths manned roadblocks on the outskirts of Kigali and threatened to kill any Belgians they found.

The Hutus accuse Belgium, the former colonial ruler, of covertly supporting the RPF which has its main office in Belgium.
